How Runoff Season May Affect You

As the winter snowpack continues to melt throughout June, please be aware of some of the ways the increased water runoff can affect you and your family.

At Home: Perceived Water Quality

Increased stream flow in the spring and early summer can cause some slight discoloration in the water that comes from your tap. This happens when water flows over leaves and twigs, similar to the effect of adding tea bags to water.

This effect is temporary and harmless. Our treatment process ensures that the water is safe to drink, even though a slight discoloration may remain. As the runoff slows later in the summer, the water will return to its normal appearance.

In the Mountains: Stream Safety

Please be extra careful when hiking or picnicking streamside during runoff season! Even a small stream is full of very cold, very fast water that can be dangerous, especially for small children and pets.

All humans and canines should avoid wading, playing, drinking from, or swimming in mountain streams during the runoff season. Also, if you are venturing into a restricted watershed area, leave your dogs at home. Violating the rules is not only dangerous for your dog and hazardous to our drinking water, but can also result in a $650 fine or even an arrest.

Beginning Mindfulness Classes Offered in June and July

After living through the stresses of the pandemic, calm your thoughts with mindfulness classes for everyone age 13 and up.

Taught by Draper resident and trained mindfulness meditation instructor Linnea Charnholm, these classes can be valuable for beginners and experienced mindfulness practitioners alike.

The series costs $12 for four classes and is conducted at the Day Barn at Draper Park. Classes will be held June 21 and 28 and July 5, 12, 19, and 26.

To register, visit the Draper City website and find the event under Residents / Community Events.

Drought Update: Cool, dry spring leads into year's driest month

The spring of 2022 has been slightly cooler than normal, but it was also the 19th driest spring on record for the past 125 years.

The green foothills reflect the cool spring weather, but water experts warn that even this could be a bad sign as we head into June, which is traditionally the driest month of the year.

As the weather heats up, the lush green plants in the foothills will turn dry and brown, setting the stage for another bad fire season.

Add to that the fact that reservoirs are lower now than they were last year at this time, and it's obvious that water conservation continues to be important for all Utah residents, as well as those across the mountain west.

We are asking our customers and other Draper residents to continue your great efforts to conserve water, especially in your landscaping. Please visit the Conservation link on our website if you're looking for a place to start.

New Employee Spotlight

Please join us in welcoming the two most recent members of our Service Maintenance Crew. Nick joined WaterPro on December 6, 2021 and Chaz became part of the team on January 26, 2022.
